

Product: Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger – Aritzia

1. Three possible segments that would be reasonable targets for the Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger are Gen Z consumers (cohort-based demographic segmentation), higher-income consumers (income-based segmentation), and consumers with a strong need for uniqueness (psychographic segmentation).

Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger is a new product that is stylish, high quality, and unique. Gen Z customers are a relevant segment due to their characteristic as stylish, open-minded, and a trend-sensitive generation. They actively keep up with current trends and adapt quickly to change. Most importantly, they are heavy users of social media, which makes them both easy to reach and highly influenced by digital content. This makes it easier to market the Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger, especially since the product is also available through Aritzia's online store.

Additionally, in 2025, Gen Z will be between the ages of 13 and 28, meaning they are falling into the teenager and young adult life stage. At this age, consumers are often trying to establish their identity, fitting in with social groups, and exploring new styles. This will be a good segment for Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger as the jogger offers not just a high quality product but a new experience for them.

Higher-income consumers are also a reasonable target. The jogger is priced higher than average and uses premium materials (e.g., soft-brushed fleece with a sueded face), which aligns with the preferences of consumers who value quality and have more discretionary income. However, income is not always a reliable predictor of buying behavior. Other factors such as individual financial habits, household responsibilities, and attitudes toward spending (e.g., tightwad vs. spendthrift) also play important roles in shaping purchasing decisions. As a result, income alone is not sufficient to define the best segment.

The third segment is based on psychographic segmentation which is consumers with a high need for uniqueness. These individuals seek out products that allow them to be different and unique. The unique non-basic colour and premium quality of Sweatfleece Mega jogger will align with their preferences. These design elements make the jogger feel different from ordinary sweatpants, which is likely to appeal to consumers who intentionally seek out extraordinary products.

Among these, the most strategic segment is Gen Z who has a strong need for uniqueness which is the combination between demographic and psychographic segmentation. The New Indigo Drop colour and the product's tagline "Our colour team is really passionate about this stuff, here is what's new, now and not black", shows that it is meant for people who want to be different and do not want to wear ordinary and basic clothes. Additionally, the brand positioning "everyday luxury" can offer a new lifestyle for Gen Z who are still trying to form their identities, exploring new products to discover who they are, and tend to spend more on trendy "feel-good" items.

2. Aritzia can leverage social influence in three ways namely collaborating with social media influencers, create a trend to encourage customers to show their experience wearing Sweatfleece Mega Jogger which can create descriptive norms, and use these descriptive norms to encourage informational and normative conformity. Aritzia can partner with fashion influencers who are seen as aspirational figures for Gen Z. These influencers act as non-brand sources, meaning they are viewed as more neutral and trustworthy than the brand itself. By wearing and reviewing the joggers on platforms like TikTok and Instagram, these influencers become aspirational reference groups. Their endorsement can create informational conformity, where consumers come to believe the joggers are stylish, high-quality, and worth purchasing simply because someone they admire said so. This strategy works particularly well because Gen Z tends to rely more on influencers than traditional ads.

Afterwards, Aritzia can create the trend by sharing how they wear their Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger using a cool hashtag like #IndigoEffect (this is the product line name). Since everyone can participate, this strategy will leverage an associative reference group such as family, friends, and peer communities, which is more personal and relatable.

To make this campaign successful, Aritzia can incorporate social proof. For example, this can highlight “Over 2,000 5-star reviews across Canada” that will shape consumer behaviour and create a positive perception of this product. As more people post their looks and share positive comments, this repeated exposure can lead to informational conformity, where consumers begin to believe that the Sweatfleece Mega Jogger must be a great product based on the enthusiasm of others. When these affirmations come from people they know or admire, they become even more persuasive and lead them to eventually buy the product (informative conformity).

As this campaign grows, it can create a descriptive norm that “everyone is wearing this”, which leads to pressure to conform. Now, consumers may buy the jogger simply to avoid feeling left out or to fit in with their social group (normative conformity). However, too much conformity can reduce the sense of uniqueness of the product. Hence Aritzia should always emphasize the jogger’s point of differentiation, such as its unique Indigo Drop wash, cloud-nine plush fleece, and everyday luxury positioning to maintain appeal among Gen Z consumers who still want to stand out while being part of a broader trend.

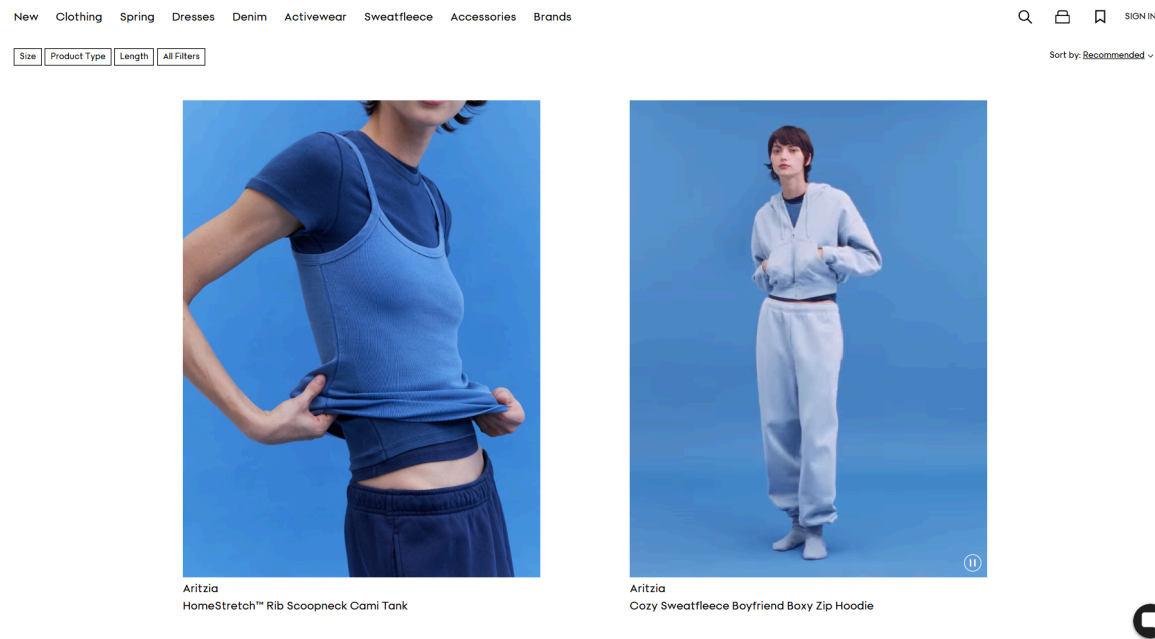

3. To shape the decision environment on the product page, Aritzia can first apply anchoring and adjustment by displaying a higher original price such as $95 and discount it to $78. This way, customers will see the discount price as a better deal than displaying it at $78 without a discount. This is because consumers' decision-making tends to use the first value they see (the original price) as an anchor, which influences how they judge the value of the discounted price.

Second, Aritzia can use the compromise effect. This involves placing the Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger between two other products. The first product is going to be a lower-priced jogger from an older line with basic features and lower quality material. The second product would be another jogger that is quite similar (slightly different in design) but more expensive (e.g. $120) and without an applied discount. This way, the older jogger would appear less appealing due to lower quality, while the other jogger less appealing due to high price. This positioning makes the Cozy Sweatfleece Mega Jogger feel like the smartest choice as it is high quality and more affordable price. Together, these two strategies can shape the decision environment that makes customers feel like they are making a financially smart decision and increase the likelihood to buy the product.

Additionally, because Gen Z is highly tech-savvy and modern, the product page must be visually appealing and aesthetic while still aligning with Aritzia’s branding. This is crucial, as different website layouts can lead to different shopping experiences. If the design strays too far from Aritzia’s established look, customers may not recognize the brand and could feel confused or even think the brand is trying to manipulate them using a compromise effect. To prevent this, any changes to the website should be made slowly and carefully so it still feels familiar. We also can incorporate information regarding the point of differentiation of the product. This way the website could appeal to both central and peripheral route customers.
